Topics covered include: How to best use Photoshop's default toolbox How to use Photoshop's layer system How to use Photoshop's color-rgb manipulations How to use Photoshop's layers & selections How to use Photoshop's filters How to use Photoshop's layer properties How to use Photoshop's tools How to use Photoshop's adjustments How to best use Photoshop's brushes How to use Photoshop's corrective layers How to correct perspective in perspective-based photography How to use Photoshop's presets How to use Photoshop's 3D tools How to use Photoshop's curves to manipulate and transform your images In addition, we have included a list of all 1001 basic to advanced, but not overly complicated Photoshop techniques. Many of the advanced techniques are presented in more detail in our free Photoshop courses. Some of the techniques are included as seperate articles, such as the free Photoshop techniques for image restoration. 1. How to Best Use Photoshop's Default Toolbox Photoshop comes with a default toolbox of about 100 tools. The tools are arranged in four categories: They are as follows: The basic tools The painting tools The image tools The drawing tools The default toolbox can be accessed by choosing Edit > Default and selecting the toolbox from the menu. The Photoshop default toolbox includes most of the tools that you will need for photo and drawing editing. 2. How to Use Photoshop's Layers Adobe Photoshop enables you to work on your images by creating layers. Working with layers reduces the risk of accidentally editing the wrong layer and also ensures that you will always have a safe place to undo your edits. Adobe Photoshop creates a default document in which all the layers are active. You can use the default layers to create a document similar to the one in the image below. To create a new document, choose File > New. Make sure that the document that you want to save will have a layer at the top of the layer stack. Most images that you will be editing will have at least one layer at the top of the stack. You can change the current active layer by choosing Layers > Active Layer.

Molecular characterization and antimicrobial susceptibility of Salmonella isolates from foods in South Korea. The occurrence of human salmonellosis in South Korea remains a concern. It is necessary to know the antimicrobial resistance patterns of salmonellae isolated from foods in this country to understand the risk of food-borne salmonellosis. The purpose of this study was to characterize the antimicrobial resistance patterns and serotype distributions of Salmonella isolates from various foods. Food samples (raw meat, raw vegetables, semi-cooked meats, and premix) were collected from local supermarkets in Gyeonggi Province and whole milk, skim milk powder, whey powder, cheese, and chicken carcasses were also collected from two chicken slaughter houses in Busan. Salmonella isolates were identified and serotyped. Antimicrobial susceptibility testing was performed using the micro-dilution method, and the results were interpreted according to the Clinical and Laboratory Standards Institute guidelines. A total of 60 Salmonella isolates were identified: 10 from chicken carcasses, 11 from chicken feathers, 16 from chicken bones, 14 from chicken meat, and 11 from raw and semi-cooked meats. Among the 60 isolates, 33 (55%) were resistant to four or more antimicrobial agents, whereas 18 (30%) were multidrug resistant. Resistance to quinolones (97% of nalidixic acid resistant isolates) was the most common resistance pattern. The most commonly observed serotype was S. Enteritidis (45.0%), followed by S. Typhimurium (14.4%). Resistance to four or more antimicrobials was common among Salmonella isolates from food in South Korea. The susceptibility to quinolone was extremely high. Of the 60 isolates, there was only one isolate from poultry that was resistant to both nalidixic acid and ciprofloxacin, which has rarely been reported. The data generated from this study may help establish strategies to control the occurrence of salmonellosis.Pros and cons of the "mono-energetic" and "poly-energetic" linear accelerator radiation therapy for benign parotid gland tumors: a case-control study. To verify whether "poly-energetic" and "mono-energetic" linear accelerators (LINAC) with simultaneous integrated boost (SIB) technique are able to achieve comparable and more consistent dose distribution patterns, and to investigate whether this is
