Get into a new way of staying organized and find your ideas. Mark-It is a Chrome extension that lets you capture text from your browser as notes. Think of it like a simplified browser sticky note. Download Mark-It & Start Marking A step to making a web site secure, it is possible to use an SSL certificate. This simply means that your web site has to be accessible through a secure connection. What this means in layman's terms, is that the web browser will display a padlock symbol next to the web address in order to prove that the connection is in fact secure. There are two types of certificates you are likely to encounter when making a website. A basic certificate which is signed by a trusted and well-known certificate provider, and a domain validated (DV) certificate, which is signed by a certificate authority that is in turn is trusted by the web browser. There are a number of reasons why you might want to make sure that your web site is HTTPS, the most common being that the site is now compatible with modern web browsers and newer versions of HTTP. HTTPS encryption works better than HTTP because, in addition to an encryption level, it can also provide a mutual authentication that ensures that a visitor who is viewing the web page is in fact the right person. This is particularly true for online banking where a user's online account credentials are transmitted in an encrypted format. This means that any person can impersonate the user and potentially gain access to the account. The use of HTTPS is often recommended for online email and other forms of online communication. SSL certificate - Beginner's guide A basic SSL certificate can be created by any certificate authority (CA). This means that any certificate authority with sufficient reputation in the world of online security can issue you with a certificate for free or for a nominal fee. The basic certificates that are issued by popular certificate authorities are EV and Common name certificates. In addition to a basic certificate, you should also make sure you have a DV certificate. A domain validated certificate means that the authority has verified the identity of the domain owner. This verifies that the website is actually owned by the website provider, and not some hackers looking to make money from your connection. If a domain has been associated with something potentially malicious, the domain name and CA can refuse to issue the certificate. This is the reason why you should only use a certificate authority that is well-known and reputable. You can verify the credentials and the online practices of a certificate authority
