The present invention relates to a crimping cylinder for use in crimping and sealing a strip of elastomeric material and relates more particularly to a crimping cylinder with a cylinder body carrying a crimping blade and a drive for reciprocating the crimping blade. In a known crimping cylinder of this type (German PS No. 14 62 356) a cylinder body, a single piston-cylinder unit rotatable about its longitudinal axis, is provided with a driven reciprocating drive and locking means with which the piston-cylinder unit is fastened to a stationary cylinder part of the housing of the crimping machine. A crimping cylinder of this type has the advantage that it is relatively inexpensive to manufacture and does not necessitate costly modification of an existing crimping device. The known crimping cylinder, however, has the disadvantage of a relatively long stroke length. This leads to a corresponding high dimensional stability of the standard overhanging profile of the strip, with a disturbing impact on the production of seals. The object of the present invention is to design a crimping cylinder of the type cited above in such a manner that the above disadvantages are avoided and in particular that the stroke length is shortened c6a93da74d
