Burton's major influences include, in their various forms, Fritz Lang's Metropolis, the German Expressionist films of F.W. Murnau and Lang's Der Letzte Mann (The Last Laugh), French and Italian film noir, German Expressionism and Verner Pantons adventure film The Red Shoes, film noir and Alfred Hitchcock's Vertigo. Burton's films have been noted for their dark and gothic atmospheres, notably The Nightmare Before Christmas, Edward Scissorhands, Sleepy Hollow, and Dark Shadows. According to Francesca Barnard, the film director of The Art of Tim Burton, "Though frequently classified as gothic, Burton's films are darkly comic—his use of allegory, double entendre, and parody both as a director and in his stories themselves, ensured his films would always be darkly surreal and paradoxical." Burton has been linked to German Expressionist and early sound films, with comparisons made between his animated films and the work of F.W. Murnau and The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari. Burton frequently draws inspiration from personal obsessions in his films. Burton has stated that he takes delight in finding easter eggs in his films for which he is unaware, and has stated that he was influenced by a wide range of comedy filmmakers, including Mel Brooks and Dick Smith, while also naming Kenneth Anger as one of his primary influences and influence. While Burton has been admired for his direction of stop-motion animation, the majority of his films are live action. His films have received acclaim from audiences and critics. Danny Elfman's score has been highly regarded, as have Burton's visual gothic settings, dark and surreal storylines and Burton's distinctive visual style. 5ec8ef588b
