Educational technology for enhancing knowledge of cancer nursing in Japan. To develop educational technology that will enhance the knowledge and understanding of cancer nursing in Japan. Previous research has shown that cancer nurses in Japan have insufficient knowledge regarding cancer and its treatment. Educational technology is an effective approach to knowledge enhancement. A sample of 600 cancer nurses in Japan with the highest educational levels were surveyed. Based on a literature review, the research team established a conceptual framework for cancer nursing and identified four areas needing further study: understanding the patient's experience of illness, communication and ethics in cancer nursing, oncology and palliative care, and work relationships. The cancer nurses were then surveyed using an online method. The sample was quite representative of nurses in Japan. They had overall insufficient knowledge regarding cancer nursing. They would like to have more knowledge about the causes, prevention, diagnosis, treatment, and nursing care of cancer. The findings of this study suggest that educational technology could facilitate knowledge of cancer nursing in Japan. Cancer nurses in Japan would benefit from educational technology that can enhance their knowledge of cancer nursing, in turn supporting the nursing practice in their society. March 8th, 2013 I read the entire manuscript and there's definitely been a change in dialogue and sentence structure, but otherwise the story is the same... The problems I had with this book were similar to the problems I had with the first—too much exposition, too much backstory, too much information. One problem that I have with John Gray's books is that I can't tell he struggles with the English language, and I started to feel like I was writing these books in English class. I didn't enjoy that about this book at all... There were parts of this book that I really liked, but there were parts of it that I didn't. There were parts of this that I thought were particularly good... Read more in this post at:
