What's New in the Trend Micro HouseCall For Home Networks?

When it comes to security, you can never be too careful, more so if we are talking about your home network, which can connect various devices, such as personal computers, laptops, TVs, storage units, tablets, smartphones, printers, and so on. HouseCall for Home Networks uses Trend Micro's antivirus engine to detect potential risks within your network and offer suggestions for fixing vulnerabilities that could cause data leaks. Not the same as an antivirus, but more of a complementary tool To put it another way, Trend Micro HouseCall for Home Networks scans all the active devices that are connected to the local network, checking their security status. Please note that this application is not a network antivirus so it shouldn't be used as a replacement for a permanent security solution. Instead, it checks whether the devices connected to the home network are vulnerable in any way to outside attacks or risking data leakage. Analyzes many network devices to find risks Obviously, Trend Micro HouseCall for Home Networks will not be able to assess the security risks for a device that is turned off so, before starting a new analysis, you should make sure all the home network devices are turned on. The scan should not take long, but that depends on the number of devices Trend Micro HouseCall for Home Networks finds. It can detect routers, Windows and Mac PCs, phones and iPads, TVs, NAS devices, printers, audio devices, IP cameras, home theaters, and game devices. For each of the items, it displays the IP and MAC addresses, the hostname, manufacturer, and model, allowing you to edit some of the details. A check sign is placed on top of each device if it poses no security risks. Suggestions to repair network security flaws Trend Micro HouseCall for Home Networks offers a way to analyze security flaws for all the devices in your private network. In case a vulnerability is identified (such as when a device has the default factory password), the application encourages you to opt for prevention and provides recommendations to address the issue. Unfortunately, there are not many other examples of what risks Trend Micro HouseCall for Home Networks could actually identify and offer advice for, which would make users understand the capabilities of the app.

Trend Micro HouseCall for Home Networks Rating [2017-12-16] This app could be very useful to someone who is looking for a comprehensive way to troubleshoot, scan and repair home networks. However, a very small, but significant, number of issues prevented me from giving this app 5 stars. Pros: This app is very easy to use. The icon on my home screen tells me whether any devices have been checked for problems in the last week. I can quickly select which devices I want to check. The app then uses Trend Micro's antivirus engine to search for any issues or possible problems.
