The intimate relationship between mature blood cells and HSCs is altered in myelodysplastic syndromes (MDS), an expanding group of disorders characterized by ineffective haematopoiesis, bone marrow failure and dysplastic changes, for which no curative therapy exists. Recent reports suggest that abnormalities in HSC niche biology and/or integrity underlie the disease, and that those cellular changes are associated with the relative increase in the in vitro HSC replicative capacity. This proposal addresses the issue of the heterogeneity of the MDS-HSC niche, by testing the hypotheses that the malfunction of HSC maintenance in MDS is associated to alterations in osteoblasts (Ob), and that aberrant Ob are capable to alter the replication rate of MDS-HSCs in vitro, which in turn could determine a selection bias towards a more primitive HSC subset. The studies will be performed on a series of MDS-HSCs in comparison with healthy HSCs. For the first aim, we will investigate the relationship between MDS-HSCs and their niche in two distinct ways. Firstly, whether MDS-HSCs retain the functional features of a quiescent HSC, and secondly, whether an abnormal niche may select for more primitive HSCs. Secondly, we will analyze the mechanisms of interaction between MDS-HSCs and niche components by assessing whether HSC alterations in MDS are a direct effect of the disease or an indirect effect of differentially secreted growth factors. For the third aim, we will test whether the altered functional properties of the niche of MDS-HSCs is associated to the observed changes in OB phenotype and function. Lastly, we will test the hypothesis that MDS-HSCs with increased replicative capacity in vitro are related to more primitive MDS-HSCs by comparing the replicative capacity of primitive MDS-HSCs with healthy HSCs. These studies will provide information on the role of the niche in the regulation of HSC fate
