A: If you know about calculus, the easiest way is to do the simplest one: you have a function $f(x)$, and you want to find the interval of maximum length at which it takes the same value. How do you do that? Take derivative and note that if $f'(x)=0$ at a point x , then the function is stationary at this point, i.e. it has the same value and the same derivative at that point. So, you get the interval $[-m,m]$, where m is the maximum of f' : $m=\max_{[-a,a]}f'(x)$. Note that f can have stationary points outside this interval, but if f is periodic, then the pointwise maximum of f' is the maximum of f' over the periodic cycle. To translate this back into your original setting, you have a function $f(x)$, it has a stationary point at 0 and the answer is the maximum length of the period, where f takes the same value and f' takes the maximum value.
