Working with images on television, screens on phones and desktops are suddenly transforming how design teams work - and what they're creating. So Adobe is changing the way it works with its Creative Cloud desktop apps to make those experiences even better. Support for Microsoft Teams has been built right into the desktop apps, enabling teams to access files from any device and share onscreen. Teams can also now access files stored on Google Drive. Adobe also announced a new icon and app design that's specifically designed to appear flawless on any screen, from phones and televisions to monitors, tablets, printers and more devices. So whether working on a smartphone or a dedicated monitor, users can enjoy the sophisticated look of their desktop apps even as they work on the smallest screens. And teams can quickly access important files stored on their local hard drives or cloud services. In addition to native GPU 2D/3D integration, the new version of Photoshop also features native GPU-based painting, adjustment, selection and effects. These spells a new era of faster and smoother performance for advanced users, especially video and animation artists, who need the high-level of control that Native GPU provides over their content. The new Photoshop also reflects the evolution of digital technology in today's marketplace and the need for content creators to use native digital platforms. With that in mind, the new Photoshop includes a new user experience to provide an immersive and interactive workspace, with new features like a refreshed interface, a gesture system, a simplified feature set, the option to separate content and workflows by image type, and the ability to open large files without running out of memory. Plus, it continues to offer easy image and content sharing across devices, including devices that don't support the new native GPU integration.

Since Version 2020 will require users to download an update to Adobe Creative Cloud on their device, the experience of working with files on their workstation and online files in the cloud will remain the same for users. In the version of Photoshop for Photocopiers, Creative Cloud requirements continue to be enforced. Photoshop for Photocopiers remains the same established feature set that has served copy users well over the last decade, except that Photoshop will now connect directly with a photocopier, creating a workflow that will allow you to make an unlimited number of copies/prints on multiple devices at a high-quality, consistent output. You can now move documents as a group when you copy between programs using CS6 and above by changing the Selection mode to As an Object and then selecting all the documents in the group. You can also copy from one application to Photoshop as a group. Of course, there are plenty of other inclusions to look forward to this year. Adobe has introduced a set of new features including Warp, Help, Mixer and other enhancements. Some of these new inclusions also work on the web with some limitations. These limitations include the lack of vector or bitmap backup, which is a huge step forward, but there is some respectable workarounds using SVG (Scalable Vector Graphics) formats. Ultimately, there are so many incredible new updates for us to look forward to this year. Adobe is bringing some of the industry's most beloved tools to the web, and you'll have the option to experience those features anywhere you like. Keep tuning in to see all the amazing new updates that are coming in the year ahead.
