[vodpod video=35758369] It's not about quantity but quality. If a predator is looking for an animal it is important that it does so in a way that causes the animal to make physical contact with it. The rubbing of fur or skin can be very effective in causing trauma, whether it is a natural rubbing or scratching caused by the predator. Trauma can be very effective in reducing fitness. If the animal is too injured to avoid the predator then it is on its own. Natural: What if a predator such as a lynx, cat or wolf was stalking a fawn? This is a small case study and may not be applicable in larger parks. But, once a predator enters a park in an area where the fawn is, it is important that it makes a physical contact with the fawn. If this can be avoided, avoid it. In one case the predator was seen and documented rubbing the fawn with the back of it's paw. It was observed that this caused the fawn to move around for 1.5 hours until it was tired and went to sleep. The predator moved on in search of another victim. Also, the rubbing of fur or skin does not have to be intentional. A predator may unintentionally rub against a small animal. This could be a very stressful experience for the fawn. If that happens, the fawn will need to be monitored for at least 3 months to be sure it survives. That experience will potentially reduce the chances that the fawn will try to avoid the predator and outrun it, instead it will allow it to run away or even find a protected place where the predator cannot get it. These are important distinctions when discussing bear hunts and trophy hunting in Wisconsin and other jurisdictions. Trophy hunting and bear hunting are not the same thing. Trophy hunting is usually involving a small predator which is hunting and feeding on a large prey animal. Trophy hunters often are not concerned with the health of the predator or the prey. Trophy animals are usually harvested for their trophy heads, claws and antlers. These trophies
